

After lunch the committee of Economic Social got right back at it starting on the topic of genetically modified seeds and contraception for underdeveloped countries. All of the delegates in this committee have very strong and passionate opinions on the subject of contraception, resulting in a long, heated debate about contraception and morality. Many of the delegates thought that it wasn't morally right to give countries with strong religious beliefs an option of contraception and birth control, and it is simply out of the UN's power to grant these countries with the option. However, other delegates thought that giving only an option of contraception clinics in these underdeveloped countries would help starvation problems because of genetically modified seeds. The delegates pro on this resolution noted that it is only an option so if the countries did not want the clinics they would not have to have them, and that it would help with the problem of over population. Delegates on both side of the debate were very passionate and gave extremely helpful and informative points.

Some delegates feel as if giving an option of contraception clinics in underdeveloped countries could be offensive or against the moral beliefs of people in these underdeveloped countries. The delegate of Jordan had strong moral beliefs on this subject and stated that by implanting these contraception clinics, the UN as a whole is implying that contraception is morally right, and even if it is optional it would not be considered moral to all countries around the world. The delegate went on saying that the UN is supposed to be a place of morality and equality for all countries. The delegate continued saying that the UN needs to save lives in a moral way, and the UN will not save lives by killing people.

On the other hand, there were delegates who agreed that the clinics and contraception would be helpful to over population, and overall would help with genetically modified seeds and food resources. These same delegates kept emphasizing how the contraception clinics would strictly just be birth prevention, and no abortions. Also, the delegates keep noting that the contraception clinics would only be an option, and no country would be forced to obtain these clinics. The delegate of Grenada, pro on the resolution, gave a speed proposing that everyone in the world has different moral standards and that no one will ever agree. She emphasized how instead of arguing the committee, as a whole, needs to compromise and understand that nothing is being forced. Furthermore, the delegate went on by saying that the committee needs to move on with the debate and arguing and get on with a vote to save lives. Following the delegate of Grenada, the delegate of Kuwait gave a pro speech proposing that the UN's job is to save lives and this resolution is essential to start saving lives.

After of over an hour of a long, passionate debate the committee then went on to a roll call vote and the resolution passed with a vote of 26 yes' and 24 no's. EcoSoc continued the afternoon going on to another resolution on micro loans and trying to come up with a solution to the problem of global debt.
